NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 25, 1868.

Eight or ten squares back of St. Charles street, running parallel thereto, is a street known as Villere street, a quiet thoroughfare, where people may find all the year round without encountering any greater excitement than that caused by the running away of a grocer's horse, or the arrest of a midnight felon. Pleasant rows of columns stand upon its sidewalks, lines of shade trees are growing before them, and in the evening scores upon scores of happy children romp and frolic. In short, Villere street is quiet, retired, and un-derminded of great events. But one morning last week there came a sensation. The dwellers in one of those quiet houses were awakened, perhaps by the sound of a gun, to find upon their doorstep, not the traditional band and bay, not an anonymous letter, or warning from the Ku-Klux, but the honest, earnest, and unassuming face of a man, dressed in the simple garb of a laborer, and with a black cap upon his head, and a bundle of papers and a bundle of papers under his arm. He was a man of middle age, with features of a man of color, and a countenance that spoke of a man of character. He was a man of color, and a man of character. He was a man of Presbyterianism.

The Old School and the New-Dr.

Presbyterianism. A Review of the Basin of Union.

At the General Assembly of the Old School Presbyterian Church, at Albany, N. Y., on Tuesday last, the subject of union between the Old and New Schools occupied the floor, in an argument which, in its nature, was entirely new. The following is a summary of the proceedings.

The Doctor then opened the Assembly's Discipline, revised edition, page 85, and read the following: "The union of the delegates, and of the New School brethren, now that the Old and New Schools are one in doctrine, and differ only in interpretation of doctrine."

The New School claimed the right and liberty to explain and interpret doctrine as they saw fit. The Old School

There is a diversity of opinion as to its cause, but it is believed to have been caused by a lightning rod.

crop is not yet ripe, it is believed to be the best for many years.
